

BACK TO SCHOOL · GET TO KNOW YOUR STUDENTS

Back to School Parent Questionnaire

Send this home the first week. Fifteen minutes at the kitchen table gives you more useful information than most of what shows up in a cumulative file — and it comes straight from the person who knows the child best.

About your child

Child's name

What they like to be called

Three words that describe my child

What they're most excited about this year

What might worry them about this year

How they learn best

They learn best when...

quiet vs. background noise, hands-on vs. reading, alone vs. with others

A subject or skill they feel confident about

A subject or skill that's been a struggle

Something that's worked at home or in past years

Best time to reach me

One thing I hope you'll do this year

Family structure, a recent change at home, a question you'd rather ask in person — whatever didn't fit above.

Three fast ways to use these answers

- Skim for icebreaker pairs. Two kids who both wrote "excited about" the same thing make an instant partner activity for week one.
- Flag one follow-up per class, not per family. If three families mention the same worry (a new schedule, a move, a sibling starting school too), that's a five-minute announcement that answers it for everyone at once.
- File the "reach me" info where you'll actually use it — your gradebook or contact sheet, the same day, before the stack grows.

Aggregate patterns across the whole stack are fine to think through with AI — "what are common first-week worries families mention" — but keep individual answers, and any names, out of the prompt.

Before you print

- Print pages 1–2 for families — that's the whole form, front and back.
- Keep this page for yourself. It never needs to leave your desk.
- Send it home the first week and set a soft return date — a Friday, not a specific day one, works well.

Want a place to log every contact you make this year? Our Parent Communication Log gives every family a page — date, topic, outcome, follow-up. In our TpT store.
